CHAPTER XV.

The Anniversary.

The story was not a long one, though it omitted nothing: the morning fox-hunt and the identification of the new arrival at Damory Court as the owner of yesterday's stalled motor; the afternoon raid on the jessamine, the conversation with John Valiant in the woods.

Mrs. Dandridge, gazing into the fire, listened without comment, but more than once Shirley saw her hands clasp themselves together and thought, too. swift and tragic sequel to that meet ing was the hardest to tell, and as she ended she put up her hand to her shoulder, holding it hard. "It was horribie!" she said. Yet now she did not shudder. Strangely enough, the sense of loathing which had been surging over her at recurrent interv. is ever since that hour in the wood, had vanished utterly!

She read the newspaper article aloud and her mother listened with an expression that puzzled her. When she finished, both were silent for a moment, then she asked, "You must have known his father, dearest; didn't you?

"Yes," said Mrs. Dandridge after a pause. "I-knew his father."

Shirley said no more, and facing each other in the candle-glow, across the spotless damask, they talked as common consent, of other things. She thought she had never seen her mother more brilliant. An odd excitement was flooding her cheek with red and she chatted and laughed as she had not done for years.

But after dinner the gaiety and effervescence faded quickly and Mrs. Dandridge went early to her room. She mounted the stair with her arm thrown about Shirley's pliant waist. At her door she kissed her, looking at her with a strange smile. "How curious," she said, as if to herself, "that it should have happened today!"

The reading-lamp had been lighted on her table. She drew a slim gold chain from the bosom of her dress and held to the light a little locketbrooch it carried. It was of black enamel, with a tiny laurel-wreath of pearls on one side encircling a single diamond. The other side was of crystal and covered a baby's russet-colored curl. In her fingers it opened and disclosed a miniature at which she looked closely for a moment.

Her eyes turned restlessly about the room. It had been hers as a girl, for Rosewood had been the old Garland homestead. It seemed now all at once to be full of calling memories of her youth.

"How strange that it should have been today!" It had been on Shirley's lips to question, but the door had closed, and she went slowly downstairs. She sat a while thinking, but at larh grew restless and began to walk to and fro across the floor, her bands clasped behind her head so that the cool air filled her flowing sleeves. In the hall she could hear the leisure ly hon-kon-kon-kon of the tall clock. evening outside was exquisitely still and the metallic monotone was anneaded with the airy fiddle-fiddle of crickets in the grass and punctuated with the rain-glad cloap of a frog. Shirley stepped lightly down to the wet grass. Looking back, she could see her mother's lighted blind. All around the ground was splotched with rese-petals, looking in the squares of light like bloody rain. She skimmed the lawn and can a little way down he lame. A shaffling sound presently quickly with a handful which she put in his grasp.

"There!" she whispered, and slipped back through the perfumed dark.

An hour later she stood in the cozy stillness of her bedroom. She threw off her gown, slipped into a soft loose robe of malze-colored silk and stood before the small glass. She pulled out the amber pins and drew her wonderful hair on either side of her face, looking out at her reflection like a mermaid from between the rippling waves of a moon-golden sea.

At last she turned, and seating herself at the desk, took from it a diary. She scanned the pages at random, her eyes catching lines here and there. 'A good run today. Betty and Judge Chalmers and the Pendleton boys. My fourth brush this season." A frown drew itself across her brows, and she turned the page. "One of the hounds broke his leg, and I gave him to Rickey." * * * "Chilly Lusk to dinner today, after swimming the Loring Rapid."

She bit her lip, turned abruptly to the new page and took up her pen. This morning a twelve-mile run to Damory Court," she wrote. afternoon went for cape jessamines." There she paused. The happenings and sensations of that day would not be recorded. They were unwritable.

She laid down her pen and put her forehead on her clasped hands. How empty and inane these entries seemed beside this rich and eventful twenty four hours just passed! What had she been doing a year ago today? she wondered. The lower drawer of the desk held a number of slim diaries like the one before her. She pulled it out, took up the last-year's volume and opened it.

"Why," she said in surprise, "I got jessamine for mother this very same day last year!" she pondered frowning, then reached for a third and a fourth. From these she looked up, startled. That date in her mother's calendar called for cape jessamines. What was the fourteenth of May to

She bent a slow troubled gaze about her. The room had been hers as a child. She seemed suddenly back in that childhood, with her mother bending over her pillow and fondling her rebellious hair. When the wind cried for loneliness out in the dark she had sung old songs to her. Sad songs! Even in those pinafore years Shirley had vaguely realized that pain lay behind the brave gay mask. Was there something - some event - that had caused that dull-colored life and unfulfilment? And was today, perhaps, its anniversary?

John Valiant sat propped up on the library couch, an open magazine unheeded on his knee. The readingstand beside him was a litter of letters and papers. The bow-window was open and the honeysuckle breeze blew about him, lifting his hair and ruffling the leaves of the papers. In the garden three darkies were laboring, under the supervision of Uncle Jefferson. The unsightly weeds and lichen were gone from the graveled paths, and from the fountain pool, whose shaft now spouted a slender spray shivered by the breeze into a million diamonds, which fell back into the pool with a tintinabulant trickle and drip.

The master of Damory Court closed the magazine with a sigh. "If I could only do it all at once!" he muttered. "It takes such a confounded time. Four days they've been working now, and they haven't done much more than clean up." He laughed, and threw the magazine at the dog who dodged it with injured alacrity. "After all, Chum," he remarked, "it's been send for me quick and speed did it." | the old jousts."

Such was the story which Uncle Jefferson told, standing in the doorway. When his shuffling step had retreated, Valiant went to the table and picked up a slim tooled volume that lay there. "The ancestral instinct," said the doctor. "I'm glad to see that it means something still, in these rotten days."

"Of course," John Valiant continued, "every one knows that he has ancestors. But I'm beginning to see that what you call the ancestral instinct needs a locality and a place. In a way it seems to me that an old estate like this has a soul too-a sort of clan or family soul that reacts on the

I lack the resources I once had, but I can give it thought and work, and if they can bring Damory Court back to anything even remotely resembling what it once was, I'll not spare either."

The major smote his knee and even the doctor's face showed a grim, if transient approval. "I believe you"! do it!" exclaimed the former. "And let me say, sah, that the neighborhood is not unaware of the splendid generosity which is responsible for

The question that had sprung to Valiant's lips now found utterance. "I gaw you look at the portrait there," he said to the major. "Which of my ancestors is it?"

The other got up and stood before the mantel-piece in a Napoleonic attitude. "That," he said, fixing his eyeglasses, "is your great-grandfather, Devil-John Valiant."

"Devil-John!" echoed his host. "Yes, I've heard the name."

The doctor guffawed, "He earned it. I reckon. I never realized what a sinister expression that missing optic gives the old ruffian. There was a skirmish during the war on the hillside yonder and a bullet cut it out. When we were boys we used to call him 'Old One-Eye.' "

"It interests me enormously," John Valiant spoke explosively.

"The stories of Devil-John would fill a mighty big book," said the major. "By all accounts he ought to have lived in the middle ages." Crossing the library, he looked into the diningroom. "I thought I remembered. The portrait over the console there is his wife, your great-grandmother. They say he bet that when he brought his bride home, she should walk into Damory Court between rows of candle sticks worth twenty-thousand dollars. He made the wager good, too, for when she came up those steps out there, there was a row of ten candles burning on either side of the doorway. each held by a young slave worth a thousand dollars in the market.

"Some say he grew jealous of his wife's beauty. There were any number of stories told of his cruelties to her that aren't worth repeating. She died early - poor lady - and your grandfather was the only issue. Devil-John himself lived to be past seventy. and at that age, when most men were stacking their sins and groaning with the gout, he was dicing and fox-hunting with the youngest of them. He always swore he would die with his boots on, and they say when the doctor told him he had only a few hours leeway, he made his slaves dress him completely and prop him on his horse. They galloped out so, a negro on either side of him. It was a stormy night, black as the Earl of Hell's riding-boots, with wind and lightning. and he rode cursing at both. There's an old black-gum tree a mile from here that they still call Devil-John's

The boit glanced from the tree and struck him between the two slaves without harming either of them. It killed his horse, too. That's the story. To be sure at this date nobody can saparate fact from fiction. Possibly he wasn't so much worse than the rest of his neighbors -not excepting the parsons. 'Other times, other manners."

Writer Thinks Nevada Indians Badly Advised in Forsaking Tribal Dance for Turkey Trot.

The once noble red man has suffered much at the hands of his paleface conqueror. He has exchanged his hunting grounds for reservations, he has traded the warpath for the trail around the bases. In place of the forest primeval he now inhabits the circus tent. He has bartered a continent for firewater and trousers.

As if this were not enough, the tragic news comes from Nevada that he has sounded still another depth of ignominy. Abandoning his tribal dances, he has taken up the turkey

Before this revelation all the old illusions as to the dignity and selfrespect of the American Indian fell with a crash. Not even the most perfervid admirer of Hiawatha's people can picture them in the mazes of the trot without a shudder. A turkeytrotting Indian deserves no greater respect than a turkey-trotting paleface clerk.

Why the red man should seek to UNDER change the ghost dance for the trot. the snake dance for the bunny hug or the fire dance for the grizzly bear is a mystery. Fifty Years a Mission Worker.

The Rev. David Thompson, D. D., of the Presbyterian mission in Japan, recently celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his arrival in that country as a mission worker. He assisted in organizing the first Protestant church in Tokyo, and for years served as interpreter to the United States legation. During his connection with the latter office he translated, among other documents, the original Japanese penal code and code of criminal procedure, which were published in the United States in 1881. Dr. Thomoson has also made many other translations on various topics. Now, at the age of seventyeight, he is still active in the cause of religion, taking part in the general work of the Japanese church.

At present it is an arid desert, but the Turkish government seems determined to do for it what Anglo-Egypt has done for the lower Nile. Sir John Jackson is to perform feats on the Euphrates by building barrages, so as to suifuse the arid regions with the fertilizing waters of the river. At first a district of 600,000 acres will be irrigated, at a cost of $7,500,000 after which the value of the land, now practically nil, will be at least $59,000,000. When entirely irrigated Sir William Willcooks estimates that this resuscitated Garden of Eden will have acquired a value of $190,000,000 .- Young Courchman.
